A descriptive essay as the name suggests is an academic piece of writing that describes either a person or something, it can be any event, place, experience, some emotions, any idea, or an action. These types of essays are meant to provide a detailed description to their readers so that the readers can create a feeling of experience without ever experiencing the object in discussion. This level of writing poses some great challenges and requires complete and undistributed attention of the essay writer.

There are two types of descriptive essays, first-person description essays, and third-person description essays. First-person description essays are the ones that are written by people who were physically at the event or have met the person themselves or felt the emotion. The third-person description essays are written by people who did not present themselves but either heard about the subject in detail from someone else or watched the videos of the event to gain the experience. Third-person description essays have also to be written in the first-person perspective which makes them hard but not impossible.

Not everyone can experience everything, but still, students are assigned description essays, and it becomes difficult for them to write a good essay and as a response to this difficulty many students either out-source their essays to essay writing service providers or copy someone else's work. To write a good descriptive essay there are a few tips that should be followed.

1. Become your audience: understanding your audience and their needs are very important while writing a descriptive essay because if you are writing for children, you have to be more descriptive and write the experience in terms that children find interesting, the same goes for every kind of audience. So, to understand your audience try to become them, for example: if you are writing for young children in middle school, try to remember what things you look for in an event when you were a child. Even if you cannot imitate your audience, ask yourself these questions.
2. How descriptive should I be?
3. What important timeline does the event/emotion/human follow?
4. What can be described as “interesting” about my subject?
5. Was there anything morally correct or wrong about my subject?
6. How would I describe my subject using minimum words?

After asking yourself these questions you should have a good idea of the flow of your essay.

1. Dig deeper: understanding the subject yourself is half of the work. First-person or third-person, it does not matter, it is not always necessary that the person who experienced the subject would have understood everything perfectly. So, you should dig deeper, surf the net and gather more information about your subject.
2. Write your essay in figurative language: descriptions do not have to be formal, or even if you are supposed to write it formally, you do not have to use extremely professional language. Use figurative language, including metaphors, write in non-literal words, all these forms of writing create more of a memorable experience and effect.
3. Cover all the aspects: what or whoever your subject is, you should not only describe what you saw. To write a great descriptive essay, you should create the complete feel of the subject you are writing about, you should explain in good detail about the environment there, explain your own feeling, write down about all the senses, what you saw, heard, smelt, touched or did.
4. Proofread: every good essay has to be free of mistakes and errors. After completing your essay, you should proofread it for spelling and grammatical errors. This phase can always be sent for essay help to write my essay service providers.
